In late 2011, after a year of extended internal deliberations, the Japanese government decided to explore the possibility of joining the Trans-Pacific Partnership (TPP) negotiations. The TPP would be a free trade agreement (FTA) among at least 11 countries-Australia, Brunei, Canada, Chile, Malaysia, Mexico, New Zealand, Peru, Singapore, the United States, and Vietnam. The United States and its TPP partners envision the agreement as a comprehensive, next-generation regional agreement that liberalizes trade and investment and addresses new and traditional trade issues and 21st century challenges. Congress has a direct and oversight role in the issue of U. S. participation in the TPP. It must approve implementing legislation, if the TPP is to apply to the United States. Some Members of Congress have already weighed in on whether Japan should be allowed to participate in the TPP and under what conditions. More may do so as the process proceeds. Although Japanese leaders have not made a final decision yet on the TPP, they have been engaging in discussions with each of nine TPP partners separate from the main TPP negotiations. (Canada and...
